This thesis delves into the concept of "conscience" in the context of social sciences, aiming to introduce and theorize a geographical approach to human conscience. The objective of this thesis is the introduction of the first integrated geographical, "more-than-anthropocentric" approach to the study of human conscience, to which the factor of "space" is argued to be of paramount significance. The application of the study of conscience to spatial matters is expressed by the term "spatial conscience"; it is determined by all sorts of human-space interrelations and interactions and shaped through human perception, emotion and behaviour. The thesis further proceeds to the application of the geographical approach to conscience through the landscape, as the most appropriate spatial unit for the analysis of conscience, and develops a model of 'landscape conscience' that pulls together human perceptions, emotions and behaviours deriving from, expressed through and affecting human-space interrelationships. This 'model of spatial conscience' is intended as a conceptual and analytical tool in the assessment, development and improvement of human spatial/ landscape conscience, in the context of landscape planning, research, education, policy formulation and implementation through public participation, etc. The particular landscape conscience model aims at the advancement of landscape theory and furthermore, it specifically purports to contribute to a broader and more effective and in-depth application of the European Landscape Convention (ELC) among European countries that lag in this respect. In fact, such an understanding, analysis and interpretation of human-landscape interactions on the basis of landscape conscience is essential and imperative if public participation and governance are to be engaged in landscape conservation, management and planning (in the context of ELC aims at more balanced human-landscape interrelations and a higher quality of life). The model is applied in the Greek countryside, and specifically on the island of Lesvos Island and in the region of Arcadia.

Thesis: Commodification & cultural identities in the rural: a case study of rural communities in Lesvos

In this paper I am discussing the ways in which cultural identities are constructed in the rural, along with the ways and the extent they become commodified, further commenting on the nature, progress and the dimensions of commodification – the significant multi-dimensional process influencing rural change. Moreover, I am examining the relationship between cultural identity (synthesized by material and symbolic aspects) and commodification through a material semiotics perspective, bringing together the symbolic and the material tradition and imposing the need for a more holistic study. The practical part of the research involves a case study in Lesvos island and applies most of the above ideas, attempting to establish the cultural identities of a sample of rural communities, to show how these identities are constructed in the rural and to outline the extent and the dimensions that they are being commodified. Finally the research seeks to consider the problems, the opportunities and the future implications of the above analysis for the future of rural communities of Lesvos and generally for the future of cultural identities in a consciously globalizing world.
